

Why would evolution tend to result in systems that act rationally? What goals are such systems designed to achieve?

Evolution can result in systems that are rational in certain contexts and scenarios. It doesn't lead to systems that are generally rational (case in point: us). Such systems are designed to achieve primitive goals such as reproduction, self-preservation, social acceptance etc.